THE DYING STATESMAN'S The sun was rising in the rast, At early dawn of day. When on his much, with friends around, The dying Statesman lay, Friends, any jour friends, were watching the Around the sick man's leel, A' d mured bim with all loving care, To save him trava the dead. But all their efforts were in vain, Although he calmiy slumb and; They knew he he'er would rise again itis moments they were numbered

His wife, his loving wif-stood by, And bathed his fevered brow; "Oh, God!" ans cried, "Oh hear my; And save my husband now." The dying Statesmen heard her voice, The voice he leved so well, And gave a loving look which said Much more than worth could tell. "Open the cusements wide," he said,
"Now give fuelt air to me,
Antered die once more I wish
The light of heaven to sea."

"Oh, die not now," his wife then solds "Hut ere you pass away, For your dear boys, my husband dear, Have you no words to kay?" He made one effort more to aponk,
Before his dissolution—
"I Es. Tell view we obey the Laws,
AND SUPPORT THE CONSTITUTION!" His head tell back, he spoke no more. Twas thus the Statesman died; His last words were for his country.
To his wife at his side,
